

Kansas historical collections

Section 12, Pages 331 - 360

This seventeen volume series is the first serial published by the Kansas State Historical Society from 1875 until 1928. The publication of the Kansas Historical Quarterly followed in 1931. Volumes 1-10 were officially titled the "Transactions of the Kansas State Historical Society." The title changed to "Collections of the..." beginning with volume 11. The series contains addresses and papers delivered at the annual meetings, biographical sketches, compiled historical information, and transcriptions of select collections in the Historical Society's holdings. The first seven volumes contain biennial reports of the board of directors. Beginning with volume 8 the biennial reports were published separately. Searchable tables of contents and indexes for each volume are forthcoming.

REPORT.

THE seventh annual meeting of the Kansas State Historical Society was held in the Senate chamber, at Topeka, January 16, 1883. Hon. T. Dwight Thacher, President of the Society, opened the meeting by delivering the following address:

THE LEAVENWORTH CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION.

I propose to speak in this address upon that movement in the history of the Territory of Kansas which resulted in the formation and adoption of what is known as the Leavenworth Constitution.

Four constitutions were framed as the organic law, before this State was admitted to the Union. The Topeka Constitution, which was the first in order, was adopted by the convention which framed it, on the 11th day of November, 1855, and by the people of the Territory at an election held December 15, 1855.

The Lecompton Constitution was adopted by the convention which framed it, on the 7th day of November, 1857. It was submitted to a vote of the people by the convention on the 21st day of December, 1857, the form of the vote prescribed being, "For the constitution with slavery," and "For the constitution without slavery." No opportunity was afforded at this election to vote against the constitution, and the Free-State people of the Territory refrained from taking part in it. The Territorial Legislature, having been summoned in extra session by Acting-Governor F. P. Stanton, passed an act submitting the Lecompton Constitution to a vote of the people, at an election to be held on the 4th of January, 1858. At that election 138 votes were cast for the constitution and 10,226 against it. Notwithstanding this overwhelming vote against the constitution, it was sent to Washington by its partisans. President Buchanan transmitted it to the Senate, urging the admission of the State under it, thus inaugurating the great contest which resulted in the division of the Democratic party, the election of Abraham Lincoln, and the final overthrow of the slave power. The bill to admit Kansas as a State under the Lecompton Constitution failed, and the English bill finally passed Congress, under the provisions of which the constitution was again submitted to a vote of the people, on the 4th of August, 1858, with the result of 1,788 votes in its favor and 11,300 against it.

The constitutional convention which framed the Leavenworth Constitution was provided for by an act of the Territorial Legislature passed in February, 1858, during the pendency of the Lecompton Constitution in Congress. The constitution was adopted by the convention at Leavenworth, April 3, 1858, and by the people at an election held May 18, 1858.

The Wyandotte Constitution was adopted by the convention which framed it, on the 29th day of July, 1859, and was adopted by the people at an election held October 4, 1859. The State was admitted into the Union under this constitution January 29, 1861.

The question is frequently asked, even by those of considerable information regarding our history, what did the Leavenworth Constitutional Convention movement mean? What relation did it hold to the great struggle through which our infant community passed in its long and perilous journey to the safe retreat of the bosom of the Union?

The Topeka constitutional movement was the instinctive effort of the Free-State people for unity about some recognized center. They must have something around which they could rally, and their leaders were sagacious enough to institute a movement which, while it served to consolidate the Free-State settlers into a compact organization, afforded a reasonable prospect of a safe and constitutional exit from their troubles. A recent precedent had been afforded by California for the spontaneous action of the people in the organization of a State government, without an enabling act from Congress. Some of the most conspicuous leaders of the Topeka constitutional movement had participated in the California movement, and were enthusiastic in the conviction that a similar success would attend the effort here. The Topeka movement did come very near success. The House of Representatives, on the 3d of July, 1856, passed a bill for the admission of Kansas into the Union under that constitution. Had the bill become a law, Kansas would have been saved the five years of turmoil and strife which elapsed before she was admitted into the Union, and the subsequent course of the great stream of our national history might have been diverted for a time at least from the bloody and fratricidal era to which it was then so rapidly and inevitably hastening.

The Topeka constitutional movement served to hold the Free-State people together until after the great wave of immigration in the spring of 1857 had virtually settled the question of the future status of the Territory. The first fruits of that immigration were the restoration of the Territorial Legislature in the fall election to the hands of the people from whom it had been rapaciously seized by fraud and violence in March, 1855. This gave the Free-State party a standpoint and leverage of undoubted legality for further proceedings. Heretofore their movements had been outside the pale of recognized authority. But the Territorial Legislature was recognized as valid by friends and foes alike. One of the first achievements of this new weapon in the hands of the people was the passage of an act, at the extra session called for that purpose by Secretary Stanton, submitting the Lecompton Constitution to an honest and fair vote, for acceptance or rejection, at an election to be held January 4th, 1858. The result of this election was the rejection of the constitution by an overwhelming vote of unquestioned legality and authority, thus furnishing an argument against the admission of the State under that constitution, which the friends of free Kansas in Congress used with tremendous power and unanswerable effect. The population of the Territory during 1856 and 1857 had increased very largely. The total vote cast for State officers under the Topeka Constitution, January 15, 1856, was 1,706; the vote on the Lecompton Constitution, January 4, 1858, was 10,427, showing an increase of more than six-fold. The old movement had lost much of its hold upon the popular mind. Admission into the Union under that constitution had ceased to be regarded as probable. While the officers who had been elected to the various positions under it were still recognized, more or less, as leaders in the Free-State organization, it was nevertheless felt that the fifty thousand new settlers who had come into the Territory during the two years which had elapsed since their election ought to have some voice in choosing the future rulers of the State. In short, there was a general clamor for a "new deal." Besides, it was argued with considerable force that the Free-State cause would be at a disadvantage should the battle in Congress and before the country against the Lecompton Constitution be fought upon the basis of the Topeka Constitution. That constitution had been framed by a convention elected without any authority of law; the total vote upon its adoption had been only 1,778, while two years had elapsed since it was framed and adopted, and meantime a large increase in the population had taken place. Its enemies might and probably would (and in fact did) claim that it no longer represented a majority of the people. The Lecompton Constitution, on the other hand, could claim a quasi legality and regularity, the convention which framed it having been elected in conformity to an act passed by the Territorial Legislature. Having the Legislature now in their own hands, the Free-State people felt that it would be the part of wisdom to call a new convention, which would have at least as good standing for regularity and legality as the Lecompton Convention, and whose constitution would receive an overwhelming indorsement at the hands of the people. The Lecompton Constitution would thus be confronted by a constitution of equal legality, of a more recent date, and of undoubted popular support.

These considerations were undoubtedly the dominant ones in determining the call of a new constitutional convention. There were minor influences which contributed to the same result. One of these, which assumed considerable importance before the Legislature passed the act calling the convention, was the question of the location of the capital. The Topeka Constitution had located the capital temporarily at Topeka, and the very name of the constitution served to keep the city prominently before the public. Other towns were ambitious of becoming the seat of government. A new constitution bearing some other name would at least divert attention from Topeka. Before the act calling the convention was passed, a scheme for locating the capital at Minneola—a town existing only on paper, and created for the purpose—was broached, and successfully carried through the Legislature. The bill locating the seat of government of the Territory at Minneola was passed over the Governor's veto, and two days thereafter the bill calling a constitutional convention, and fixing Minneola as the place where it should assemble, was also passed.

The "Minneola swindle," as it was called in those days, created a great sensation in Kansas—so great as to seem almost extravagant as we look back upon it now. The gravamen was, that the location of the capital at Minneola was a scheme to further the personal fortunes of members of the Legislature who were interested in the new town. In vain did they reply that the location was a good one—central, and well adapted to be the future capital of the State; that the capital was bound to be removed from Leecompton in any event, and that, wherever located, somebody's private fortunes would be enhanced thereby. The public judgment was severe, and condemned the thing to such a degree that many of the delegates elected to the constitutional convention were instructed by their constituents to vote for an immediate adjournment of that body to some other point in the Territory. It thus came about that the convention had no sooner completed its organization at Minneola, than a motion was made to adjourn to some other place. This gave rise to a long and acrimonious debate. The session was prolonged during the whole night, and toward morning the motion to adjourn, and fixing the city of Leavenworth as the place of reassembling, was passed. On the morning of the 24th of March, 1858, the members took their departure for Leavenworth, leaving this capital of a day to revert to its pristine condition of a quarter-section of Franklin county prairie. And thus the constitution which the body afterward framed became known in our history as the Leavenworth Constitution, and not as the Minneola Constitution as its original projectors had expected.

The convention reassembled in Leavenworth on the evening of the 25th of March. The constitution was adopted and signed on the 3d of April. The work had been done with brevity and dispatch. Indeed, there was no great amount of work to be done. Aside from the special features to be hereafter noted, the draft of the Topeka Constitution was closely followed. There were few questions which gave rise to debate, and they were speedily settled. It was the aim of the convention to do its work as speedily as possible, make a good constitution, and adjourn. The constitution was adopted by the people on the 18th day of May, 1858, and on the same day the following State officers were also elected under it, viz.: Governor, Henry J. Adams, of Leavenworth; Lieutenant-Governor, Cyrus K. Holliday, of Topeka; Secretary of State, E. P. Bancroft, of Emporia; Treasurer, J. B. Wheeler, of Doniphan; Auditor, Geo. S. Hillyer, of Grasshopper Falls; Attorney General, Chas. A. Foster, of Osawatimie; Superintendent of Public Instruction, J. M. Walden, of Quindaro; Commissioner of School Lands, J. W. Robinson, of Manhattan; Representative in Congress, M. F. Conway, of Lawrence; Supreme Judges, Wm. A. Phillips of Lawrence, Lorenzo Dow of Topeka, and Wm. McKay of Wyandotte; Reporter of the Supreme Court, Albert D. Richardson, of Sumner; Clerk of the Supreme Court, W. F. M. Arny, of Hyatt. Of these, Messrs. Holliday and Conway had been elected to positions in the State Government under the Topeka Constitution, Mr. Holliday having been Secretary of State, and Mr. Conway one of the Judges of the Supreme Court.

The State officers under the Leavenworth Constitution were nominated upon a platform whose chief resolve was, "That should Congress accept the application accompanying the Lecompton Constitution, and admit Kansas as a sovereign State in the Union, without the condition precedent that said constitution, at a fair election, shall receive the ratification of the people of Kansas, then we will put the Leavenworth Constitution, ratified by the people, and the government under it, into immediate and active operation as the organic law and living Government of the State of Kansas, and that we will support and defend the same against any opposition, come from whatever quarter it may." Before the election took place, however, the "English bill" had passed both houses of Congress and become a law, so that the Lecompton struggle was over, and the long and bitter and bloody contest to make Kansas a slave State came to a close.

The movement for admission under the Leavenworth Constitution was prosecuted no further, and the convention and its work survives only upon the pages of our chequered history as one of the positions temporarily occupied by the great Free-State host in its onward march to final victory.

It would be an interesting study, had we time to do so, to compare the provisions of the four constitutions which were successively framed as the fundamental law of this State. Outside of the stormy and convulsed domain of the slavery question, the differences in the constitutions are not remarkable. In this domain, however, the differences are distinct and antipodal. The Lecompton instrument voiced the extremest doctrines of the slave power. In the article on "Slavery"—for slavery was the subject of a separate article—it is declared that "the right of property is before and higher than any constitutional sanction, and the right of the owner of a slave to such slave and its increase is the same and as inviolable as the right of the owner of any property whatever." The Legislature was declared to have no power to pass laws for the emancipation of slaves without the consent of their owners, nor without paying to their owners before emancipation a full equivalent in money for them. The framers of this instrument seem to have labored to emphasize the degradation of manhood on the one hand, and the elevation and sanctification of chattelhood on the other. Instead of the usual declaration that all men are equal in rights, they declare "that all freemen, when they form a social compact, are equal in rights," and they add "that no freeman shall be taken or imprisoned or disseized of his freehold, liberties or privileges, or deprived of his life, liberty, etc., but by the judgment of his peers or the law of the land." In the schedule to the constitution they provide that, even though the vote should be for the constitution without slavery, still "the right of property in slaves now in the Territory shall in no manner be interfered with;" and in the section relating to amendments to the constitution it is expressly and carefully provided "that no alteration shall be made to affect the rights of property in the ownership of slaves." Under these provisions Kansas would, in any event, have been a slave State and remained such as long as any of the slaves then living in the Territory, or any of their descendants, to the remotest generations, should have remained among us.

These extreme and almost frantic provisions for the perpetuity and sanctity of property in slaves, viewed from our present standpoint, and with the light of the past twenty-five years of eventful and startling history bearing full upon them, seem chimerical and almost childish; but we are to remember that at that time these monstrous doctrines dominated this country, controlled the utterances of the Supreme Court, were backed by the Army and Navy, and commanded the hearty support or the unprotesting acquiescence of a majority of the people. It was the merest margin and verge of chance that prevented these doctrines from being incorporated in the organic law of our State. The motion which finally resulted in what is known as the English bill, and saved us from admission under the Lecompton Constitution, passed the House of Representatives by a majority of only one vote.

The framers of the Leavenworth Constitution studied to antagonize these peculiar and abhorrent, though characteristic, pro-slavery doctrines of the Lecompton instrument. Thus the first section of the bill of rights follows almost the exact language of the Topeka Constitution, in saying that "all men are by nature equally free and independent, and have certain inalienable rights, among which are those of enjoying and defending life and property, acquiring, possessing and protecting property, and seeking and obtaining happiness and safety," and then goes on to add, "and the right of all men to the control of their persons, exists prior to law and is inalienable"—a clause which is certainly somewhat pleonastic, and is not to be found in the corresponding section of the Wyandotte Constitution, (which section, by the way, is more tersely and comprehensively expressed in the Wyandotte Constitution than in either of the others,) but was added for the specific purpose of antagonizing the declaration of the Lecompton instrument that the right of property is before and higher than any constitutional sanction. Our idea was to antagonize the dogma of the right of man to property in man by the doctrine of the right of man to himself. It was liberty set over against slavery. So, too, the section of the Lecompton Constitution that no freeman shall be deprived of life, liberty or property except by the judgment of his peers, and the law of the land is repeated almost word for word, with the word "person" substituted for the word "freeman."

The section forbidding slavery is the same in the Leavenworth and Wyandotte Constitutions, and is a repetition of the section in the Topeka Constitution that "there shall be no slavery in this State, nor involuntary servitude, unless for the punishment of crime," and adds the clause, "whereof the party shall have been duly convicted."

The Leavenworth Constitution contains nowhere the word "white." There is not a word in it which refers to color. The expression "white male citizen," or "white male," which might probably then have been found in the constitution of every State in the Union, is not to be found in it. No change would have been required in its provisions or language to have made it in perfect harmony with the fourteenth and fifteenth amendments to the Constitution of the United States. This was not the result of accident, but was achieved as we have related elsewhere, by the determined and persevering efforts of some of the most brave and far-seeing spirits of the convention, who meant, if possible, that the invidious and un-republican distinction of color as in any way affecting men's rights, should have neither place nor countenance in the constitution. This result was not achieved without a struggle. The question was debated in some form and upon some clause or section of the constitution nearly every day of the session, but always with the same result.

Strange as it may appear, the Lecompton Constitution does not contain the word "white" in its article on elections and the right of suffrage. Section one begins: "Every male citizen of the United States, etc., etc., shall be entitled to vote." The Leavenworth Constitution adopts in its article on the elective franchise the identical expression, "Every male citizen of the United States." The correspondence was not accidental; it was intentional. The framers of the Lecompton instrument meant to emphasize the extreme doctrine of the slave power, that none but white men could be citizens of the United States; the framers of the Leavenworth Constitution, on the other hand, meant to emphasize the doctrine that every man born upon the soil and under the flag of the Union was a citizen of the United States. Indeed, the careful reader of the two constitutions will not fail to note how radically antagonistic they are. The one was intended to offset the other. The one embodied the most radical doctrines of the slave power; the other anticipated the advanced and humane doctrines of republican equality which remain as the most precious legacy of the great War of the Rebellion.

The Convention consisted of eighty-four members. Of these, Caleb May and Wm. R. Griffith had been members of the Topeka Constitutional Convention, and were afterwards members of the Wyandotte Constitutional Convention, the only individuals who were members of all of them. Five others, namely, James H. Lane, M. F. Conway, W. Y. Roberts, James S. Emery and Joel K. Goodin, had also been members of the Topeka Constitutional Convention; C. A. Foster had been Assistant Secretary of the Topeka Convention. James M. Winchell was afterwards President of the Wyandotte Constitutional Convention, and John Ritchie and Wm. McCulloch were also members of both. James H. Lane was elected President of the Convention when organized at Minneola, but resigned at Leavenworth, and Martin F. Conway was elected his successor. Samuel F. Tappan was Secretary.

Of the eighty-four members, many have since made men of mark. Winchell, as I have just said, was President of the Wyandotte Constitutional Convention; Lane was one of our first United States Senators; Conway was our first Member of the House of Representatives; Thos. Ewing, jr., was first Chief Justice of the State, and has since been eminent in the field and forum and at the bar; H. P. Johnson died at the head of his regiment during the war; Wm. Spriggs was second State Treasurer; A. Lazerlere was Speaker of the Territorial House of Representatives in 1859; W. Y. Roberts served with distinction as Colonel during the war; P. B. Plumb is our present efficient and popular junior United States Senator; J. R. Swallow was elected State Auditor in 1864; Henry J. Adams was nominated for Governor under the Leavenworth Constitutional Convention; F. G. Adams is the present able and excellent Secretary of the State Historical Society; W. F. M. Army was Secretary of New Mexico for years, and has but recently passed away; C. H. Branscomb was United States Consul at Manchester, England; James S. Emery has been United States District Attorney for Kansas, and a Regent of the State University; Samuel N. Wood has been repeatedly a member, and once Speaker of the House of Representatives; John Ritchie was a Colonel during the war; Wm. R. Griffith was our first and Isaac T. Goodnow our second Superintendent of Public Instruction; A. Danford was elected Attorney General in 1868; Robert B. Mitchell rose to distinction in the war, and was Governor of New Mexico; Edward Lynde was Colonel of the Ninth Kansas Regiment; F. N. Blake was United States Consul to Quebec; J. M. Walden has become an eminent clergyman of the Methodist Episcopal church. There are others, I doubt not, worthy of mention, but these occur to me upon hastily reading over the list.

Taking them as a whole, I doubt whether an abler body of men was ever assembled in the State. Lane, of course, was the chief figure. He lived in Lawrence, but he appeared in the convention as a delegate from Doniphan county. He took little interest in the proceedings of the convention, but spent much of his time during the sessions in pacing up and down in the area in the rear of the members' seats, running his hands through his hair, from the base of the brain forward over the top of the skull, as his habit was. He looked merely at the political aspects of the movement. For the constitution, as a constitution, he seemed to care but little. Perhaps he foresaw the remote probability of the admission of the State under it. He wanted to be elected President of the Convention because, first, he had been President of the Topeka Convention; and, secondly, he had had a quarrel with Gov. Denver and wanted his favorite "indorsement" from the repre-

representatives of the people. When Conway remonstrated with him at Minneola for wanting to accumulate honors upon himself unduly, he promised to resign in Conway's favor when the convention should get to Leavenworth, and he kept his promise. He was inclined to side with the radical members of the convention, but he rendered them little assistance on the floor. He was not a leader. In the most exciting debate of the convention, namely, that over the question whether, in case the State were admitted under the Lecompton Constitution, the government under the Leavenworth Constitution should be put in operation, he took no part whatever. At Minneola, upon the night of adjournment, he made a powerful and dramatic speech. The night was far spent. The candles had burned down in their sockets. The debate had been long, and at times angry. Some of the members were deeply interested in Minneola, and in their excitement they threatened that if the convention should adjourn from Minneola they would abandon the Free-State party and break it up. This threat aroused the sleeping lion in Lane. He came down from the chair, where he had presided with great fairness during the long debate, and took the floor. All eyes were upon him. The drowsy members sat upright. As he proceeded with his speech the interest intensified, and members began to gather round him, sitting upon the desks and standing in the aisles. I shall never forget the scene—the dimly-lighted room; the darkness without; the excited men within; little Warren, the Sergeant-at-Arms, standing unconscious upon the floor, with partly outstretched arms, and wholly carried away by the speech; and Lane himself aroused to a pitch of excitement which I never saw him manifest on any other occasion during his whole career. As he drew near his peroration, he painted a picture of the Free-State party of Kansas; of what it had done and suffered for the great cause of human liberty; of the crisis that was then upon it, and of the responsibilities resting upon its members. He then alluded to the threats that these men interested in Minneola had made of abandoning and breaking up the party, and said that if in the momentous and supreme hour of the party's struggle they were bound to leave it on account of a few paltry shares in Minneola, then let them go—and go to hell!

Conway followed Lane in the same strain, and in a speech which at any other time would have been a powerful one, but its effect was lost in the storm which Lane's outburst had aroused, and it passed almost unnoticed. The vote was taken, and the convention adjourned to Leavenworth.

Martin F. Conway was an active participant in all the proceedings of the convention. He was an excellent presiding officer, and his speeches when he took the floor were earnest, impassioned and logical. He had read and studied, more deeply perhaps than any other member of the convention, the theory of our governmental system, and was positive and well fortified in his convictions. Coming from a slave State himself, and a great student of the writings and speeches of leading statesmen of the South, he more thoroughly comprehended the nature, the designs and the ambitions of the slave power, and seemed to more intensely hate it, than any other man among us. His subsequent life, with its single brief success, and its numerous and prolonged misfortunes, down to his confinement and death in an asylum in Washington, made up a strange career even in this country of surprises and contradictions.

One of the most marked members of the convention was Thomas Ewing, jr. This gentleman added to the graces of a youthful and engaging person the charm of attractive manners and a brilliant mind. He took an intelligent interest in the work of the convention, and was ready and effective in debate. His speeches wore the air of preparation, while his manner had an appearance of dignity and restrained enthusiasm, which left the impression of reserved force and an unexpended power upon the mind of the hearer. He always seemed like a man who had not done his best, but who upon proper occasion could rise to still more masterful heights of argument and eloquence. He was the easy leader of the conservative wing of the convention, and championed their views with conspicuous, though ineffectual, ability.

It would be easy to indulge in personal reminiscences of many other members of the convention, but the limits of the present occasion will not allow me that pleasure.

The most exciting debate in the convention over any part of the constitution occurred, as I have previously mentioned, in connection with section 5 of the schedule, which provided that in case the constitution should be adopted by the people, then upon the admission of Kansas into the Union as a State, the constitution should be in full force, the State officers should immediately enter upon the discharge of their duties, and the Governor should immediately, by proclamation, convene the General Assembly. As we have already seen, this Leavenworth constitutional movement was going on at the very time that the bill for the admission of Kansas under the Lecompton Constitution was pending in Congress, and was intended as the counter movement of the Free-State people against that measure. The contingency of the admission of the State under the Lecompton Constitution had to be contemplated. The Free-State people had full control of the Territorial Legislature. A portion of them had taken part in the election of officers under the Lecompton Constitution, and had really carried that election, electing the entire set of State officers under it, but on the face of the returns, including the fraudulent returns from Oxford, Shawnee and Kickapoo, the Pro-Slavery officers were elected, and Calhoun, the President of the Lecompton Constitutional Convention, had the granting of certificates both to the State officers and to the Legislature. There was no sufficient or reasonable doubt that Calhoun would carry out the Pro-Slavery programme to the end. He had already declared the constitution "with slavery" adopted, and he would doubtless give certificates to the Pro-Slavery officers under it.

The plain question which confronted the Free-State people was, what would they do under these circumstances? Their answer was contained in the fifth section of the schedule which we have above quoted. The debate over this section was fierce and prolonged. It lasted the whole day. Members felt that it involved what might become very practical and serious issues. The one side maintained that it was the only logical, consistent and courageous position for the Free-State people to take. The other contended that it looked to a conflict with the General Government, which could only result in disaster and defeat. Ewing led off on the conservative side, in opposition to the section, in a magnificent speech. Conway came down from the chair, and spoke in its defense. Others followed, on either side, until the day wore away. When the vote was finally reached, the section was adopted by a decided majority. I do not recollect that Lane said a single word on either side of this debate. As to which side was right, it is unnecessary now to discuss. The progress of events fortunately prevented the question at issue from ever becoming a practical one. Had it become so, however, I am strong in the belief that the Free-State people would have been victorious in the struggle which must have ensued.

The events which we have been contemplating occurred a quarter of a century ago. The men who were then in middle or later life have now become aged men or have passed away. Those who were then in the bloom and vigor of early manhood are now carrying gray hairs and looking upon the afternoon sun. Of the members of that convention, Lane, and Conway, and Winchell, and Larzelere, and H. P. Johnson, and W. Y. Roberts, and Josiah Pillsbury, and Henry J. Adams, and Henry Harvey, and Robert B. Mitchell, and Amasa Soule, and E. S. Scudder, and Swallow, and Griffith, and Arny—and I know not how many others—have passed over to the other side. Many are still left in active life, and some are occupying positions of trust and responsibility. The cause which they and so many others labored for has gloriously triumphed. The State whose infancy they watched over with such solicitude, and the tides of whose life they so earnestly sought to turn into the channels of freedom, has become a free, prosperous, and mighty commonwealth.

Ad astra per aspera. They saw the trials: we see the stars. It is the glory of the pioneers of Kansas, that, when called to fill a gap for freedom, they filled it; when summoned to meet a crisis for human rights, they met it; when appointed by God to resist and beat back the onward march of Slavery and save a future State for Civilization and Liberty, they did it!

REPORT OF THE BOARD OF DIRECTORS.

At the conclusion of the President's address, the Secretary read the third biennial report of the Board of Directors, as follows:

The act of the Legislature defining the relations of the Historical Society to the State makes it the duty of the Board of Directors to report biennially the transactions of the Society during the two years. Such report is here given, together with lists and statements intended to exhibit the character of the library and collections which are being made up.

These collections of the Society go to make up a library, and, to some extent, a museum of history. The latter embraces objects which go to illustrate the modes of life of our pioneer settlers, their political struggles, and hardy experiences; war relics; pictures, which show the earliest structures in our towns, the first abodes of our frontier inhabitants, their log and sod school houses; the stages of improvement in town and country, from year to year and from decade to decade; portraits of prominent citizens, especially of those who have made a record for usefulness in founding the institutions of the State, or in developing its resources. Objects illustrating the history and manners and customs of the Indians or other inhabitants, also come into our collection.

But the chief and essential feature of a historical society is its library work, and its library accessions are always most important. What this library work should consist of, experience has well established, and the Legislature of the State, in prescribing the duties of the Society, has defined. It is to make an ample library of reference for the people of the State—one which shall enable the public officer, the student, and the writer, to gather the facts as to the true origin and history of all things pertaining to the State and the country; a library which shall contain copies of every book of history which has been written or published relating to the State of Kansas, general and local—State, county, town and neighborhood histories—whether they have been published in books, pamphlets or newspapers, or yet remain in manuscript, and the same, as far as practicable, as to the history of the country in all respects; a library of public documents of the State, and of the country, of all kinds; of reports and proceedings of all State institutions; reports of schools, churches, and all societies, with sketches of their history; reports of municipal corporations, and of railroads, manufactories, and other business organizations whose work it is to develop the resources of the State and of the country.

A prominent, and certainly in essential respects the most valuable portion of the library of the Society, is that of its files of newspapers. Of these, the shelves of the library contain 2,525 bound volumes. These files contain the history of Kansas; of every county, and it might almost be said of every neighborhood and hamlet, in detail. All authorities on this subject ascribe to newspaper files the greatest value of all the materials of history, as being absolutely essential in respect to correct and indispensable data. The files in our library have been almost wholly contributed by the Kansas editors and publishers, as a free gift; the only consideration being that of membership of the Society, and the privilege of a voice in the management of its affairs, and of directing it in a manner best to subserve the public good. The editors and publishers of the Kansas newspapers organized the Society, and have always constituted its chief membership. In the contributions of files of their papers to its library they have exceeded those of any other State in generous gifts to the public.

To show the appreciation which men of this class have of the worth of newspaper files as records of history, we quote from a published editorial written by one of the early presidents of this Society in his comments upon the value of the files of his own newspaper, as materials of the history of the town and county in which his paper for the last twenty-eight years has been published. Reference is made by the editor of the Atchison Champion in an anniversary mention of his newspaper. He says:

"Piled up in the corner of the Champion office, is the most complete history of Atchison that will ever be written. It is comprised in thirty-five bound volumes of the Champion, weekly and daily, from the first issue made by the present proprietor, February 20, 1858, up to the present time. In these papers—many of them beginning to take on the yellow hue of age—every essential fact connected with the growth and development and daily life of the city of Atchison is recorded: marriages and deaths; the establishment of business and manufacturing enterprises, and their changes; transfers of property; the erection of all important buildings; the results of elections; the opening of streets; the building of railroads; fires and floods; the municipal policies suggested, discussed, and adopted; and the daily life, thoughts, hopes, triumphs and disappointments of an aspiring and energetic community, are all embodied in these files."

What the files of the Champion are to Atchison county, the files in the library of the State Historical Society are to Kansas. They come in from every county and town where a newspaper is published—from the oldest to the newest. Dating from the first newspaper, printed under the shade of a tree on the banks of the Missouri river, in 1854, where the city of Leavenworth now stands, to the newest printed paper in Rawlins and Kearney counties, our library contains them all—all the newer, and most of the older. Our library contains absolutely the only files in existence of several of the first and leading papers published in the Territorial period. This is true of the earliest papers published in Leavenworth and Lawrence. And of the newest, in several instances, the library contains the only files. It is the pioneer newspaper, published in the shanty or the dug-out, whose files are most liable to destruction; yet they are in many respects those most important to save. They contain the actual and only record of the early struggles of the adventurous pioneers in their work of transforming the desert into the abodes of men; in establishing farms, towns, schools, churches, societies, and municipal government. It has happened already in instances, that newspaper files in the library of the Society, published in the frontier counties, have been consulted in respect to data of important transactions, for the reason that the local file of the newspaper had been destroyed. So in the older counties, there is no exemption from liability to loss. In the case of the Atchison Champion, its office files were at one time burned, and had it not been for the unusual prudence of the editor in having kept duplicate files of his paper in his dwelling house, there would have been left no files of that paper in existence. In the case of the oldest paper published in Johnson county, the Olathe Mirror, its entire office, including all its accumulated files, were a few months ago destroyed by fire. For information in opening their book accounts, on resuming publication after the fire, the publishers were obliged to procure the use of the Historical Society files of the few months preceding. A similar instance occurred at Kinsley, in Edwards county, some years ago. All the older files of our library are kept in a fire-proof vault provided by the State for that object; at the same time, the rooms of the Society themselves may be regarded as fire-proof.*

Next in importance to the printed materials relating directly to the history of our own State, may perhaps be regarded the books and materials of the history of adjacent States. Books of exploration and discovery, and those relating to the local history of every State, and of every part of the country, are appropriate in a Kansas historical library. Our people are from every part of the country, and their children are, and for all time will be, interested in investigating the history and institutions of every part of the country. Standard works of the general history of the country, and of all countries, are of course appropriate. So, too, such a library should be one of ample reference in respect to books of science. Especially is this true, when it is considered that the most valuable and most numerous class of scientific books, and those which abound in the results of original investigations, are those published either by the United States Government or by the States, and can be procured without cost, or only at the cost of exchanges of publications of our own State. Our library has already become quite a full one as to this class of books.

The Society, through the request of Hon. John J. Ingalls, was, as early as 1876, made a public depository of the documents published by the United States Government. Since that date they have largely been received. Through the joint request of both Senators Ingalls and Plumb, there have been added to these deposits, during the past few months, the number of 877 volumes of the public documents, running back as early as the year 1845, and including partial sets of the annals and debates of Congress.

The Congressional and Executive documents are absolutely necessary to a library of materials of the history of Kansas; and of course essential to the history of the affairs of the country. Kansas, for ten years from the time the proposal was first broached of opening its territory to settlement, was a leading subject of discussion and agitation in the Congress of the Nation; and all the departments of the Government were made to teem with reports and papers relating to Kansas. Every year's national transactions will continue to relate more or less to questions affecting our public lands, to Indian affairs, and to educational, agricultural, scientific and other subjects directly affecting the interests of our people. As these documents come as a free gift, it would be a sad neglect on the part of the State not to make up collections of them, both in the State library and in the library of the State Historical Society; these should include complete sets of the debates of Congress. When it is considered that the library work which Kansas is now doing is in its very infancy, and that every year the earlier documents of the Government become more and more scarce, a moment's reflection must show to all that it is only a question of time when the most unimportant document of a public character will come to be considered worth almost its weight in gold.

*On the night of January 17, 1883, but a few hours after the reading of the above paragraph in this report, at the annual meeting of this Society, the Champion office was again burned, and its office files destroyed. Col. Martin had, however, by great effort, gathered up and completed a duplicate set of files subsequent to the first fire, so he has yet a set of files remaining.

The office of the Independent Press, Humboldt, was burned January 10, 1883, and all its files destroyed.

A conference has been had between the Board of Directors of the Society and the Trustees of the State Library with a view to the transfer of the historical and miscellaneous department of the State Library to the State Historical Society, leaving the State Library to what must always be its chief work, that of a library of books of law and of reference for the use of the courts and of attorneys practicing in them, and of public documents such as it is desirable that the State should have duplicates for reference by its public officers and the Legislature. It was thought such transfer could be made without legislative action, but upon consideration, the Trustees of the State Library decided that they had not authority to act in the premises without direct legislative sanction, and the matter rests awaiting such action as the Legislature may take.

The Board gives as reasons for the proposed change, that the State Library is essentially and chiefly a law library, being placed in the care of the Justices of the Supreme Court, who are its trustees, charged with the duty principally, and almost solely, of providing books of reference for the use of the courts of the State and the attorneys practicing therein. Experience in all of the States shows that this work comes to engross almost the entire care of those having charge of such libraries, and that any general and historical library work undertaken is necessarily made secondary to the main purposes of the library. The State Historical Society is an organization made up of all classes of the people. It has for its sole object the collection of information for the use of the people. Its library comes to be largely made up of contributions of its members and of the interested public. Its Board of Directors is selected on account of their interest in making up for the people a library of the history of the State and of the country, and of general information for the free use of the citizen, of the student, of the public officer, and of the public instructor. Their work is for the entire people. The experience of all of the States, as shown by public-library statistics, abundantly proves that it is only through historical societies, with legal relations to the State such as this Society has, that the general, miscellaneous and historical library work of a State is well done.

The State cannot be expected to maintain two libraries of the same character. Great embarrassment must arise in the effort to make either of such libraries complete in any of the lines of books which it is desirable that they should contain. One library becomes the duplicate of the other, and each conflicts with the other in the effort to accomplish what the State most needs in a library of history and general reference.

Both of these libraries have recently been removed to new apartments in the State House. They are yet in a measure unclassified, and are uncatalogued. Before they are catalogued, the library policy of the State should be definitely settled by the Legislature. To leave the work in its present distracted and divided condition, would be a neglect on the part of the State to justly recognize the services to the State of that large class of public-spirited citizens who have, during the past seven years, founded and given to the State a library of thousands of volumes, among which may be mentioned as of chiefest value, over 2,000 of the files of Kansas newspapers—a voluntary gift to the State by the founders and members of this Society.

That the proper sphere of a general library, as distinguished from a library for the use of the bar and the courts, is precisely the same as that of a historical library, we make the following quotation from a paper on the subject of State Libraries, contained in the volume issued by the United States Bureau of Education, in 1876, entitled "Public Libraries in the United States of America—their History, Condition and Management." The paper to which reference is made was written by Henry A. Homes, LL. D., Librarian of the General Library of the State of New York, a gentleman who is the very highest authority on this subject. He says:

"A State library will of course make it one of its special aims to collect works of American history in general, just so far as the means at its disposal will admit. But of all the purposes for which it exists, none respond so directly to the wants of the largest number of citizens of a State as to aim to collect all the materials accessible to illustrate the history of the State, its counties, its towns, and its citizens. The authorities of the library will therefore be attentive to secure all local histories and biographies, manuscript collections of the papers of its eminent citizens, the official proceedings of all counties and towns, reports of all societies—charitable, commercial, manufacturing, military and secret, and as many of the newspapers printed in the State as can be obtained, with its almanacs, and business and town directories. To these will naturally be added works in science and the arts which relate more particularly to the productions of the State. An honorable historic consciousness will be promoted by securing works of merit of all kinds written by citizens of the State.

"Much might be said regarding the value of the different classes of books just mentioned; a value which grows with successive years. We will, however, single out from among them for particular notice, the class of newspapers. For many towns and counties they are the only printed record of the earliest facts of local history. Their value in libraries is already recognized in our Western States. The Indiana State Library receives twenty-eight newspapers as an annual gift; Minnesota was receiving forty in 1862, and Ohio receives twenty-eight. The New Jersey Library invites donations of the same kind. There can be little doubt that the publishers of a large portion of the newspapers of any State would preserve and give to the State the file of each year, on the single condition that it should be promptly bound, and be made accessible to the public."

In this statement of the true province of a general or miscellaneous State library is described the character of library work which the Kansas State Historical Society is striving to do; and it is a kind of work which is uniformly neglected in State libraries. It is neglected for the reason that it is a work made subsidiary to that of providing a library of books for the use of courts and attorneys, and because the work of such libraries does not enlist the coöperation and aid of the people.

The State Historical Society's work was begun in 1876; and the growth of its library of books, pamphlets and newspaper files, not including its many thousand manuscript papers, maps and other materials of history, is shown in the following table:

| Date. | Volumes. | News-paper files. | Pam-phlets. | All. | Total. |

Among the generous contributors to the library, the names of Major James B. Abbott, of DeSoto, and Mrs. Abbott, are worthy of special mention. From their well-preserved accumulations of twenty-eight years' residence in Kansas, they have made the Society, of books, pamphlets, manuscripts, newspaper files, pictures and relics, most valuable donations. These will be found mentioned in the several classified lists.

Mr. Frank A. Root, now of Gunnison, Colorado, an early resident of Kansas, and one of its oldest and most enterprising newspaper publishers, on removing to Colorado, some two years ago, drew from his accumulated literary stores a large fund, which he generously gave to our Society, of which he had been a member from its organization. These are also described in the lists to which they belong.

Mrs. Mary A. Brown and Miss Sarah Brown, of Saratoga, California, widow and daughter of Capt. John Brown of Osawatomie, have given the Society an invaluable contribution from the original family letters and papers, written by Captain Brown and his sons, together with many letters written by others, relating to Kansas. Accompanying these were several relics of that remarkable man, which make a most interesting addition to the museum of the Society.

Mr. and Mrs. Henry K. Winans, of North Topeka, Kansas, have made generous contributions and deposits from the library of and literary effects of the late Hon. Alfred L. Winans, including some very rare and costly
